

At the Wave of a Hand

The Court at the Ministry of the Tragic records its proceedings with the Accidentally Automatic Capillary Quill. When you are looking into the trial records, you find that Judge Scambridge has mysteriously encrypted her court proceedings thus, and so her proceedings are recorded as sections of conversation in some strange form.

You know about the premise of certain trials, so to decipher her records you quietly bring the first five pieces of the Trial 310696A records back with you.

You know that it begins with:

THE COURT: Are you ready to enter a plea at this time?

THE DEFENDANT: Yes, your honor.

THE COURT: How do you plead to counts one and two?

Unfortunately in a hurry, they were procured in an order different from the real one, so you have the added trouble of sorting out the order.

On the next page are the five pieces, in some arbitrary order.

Q.1. Write the correct order of the pieces.

Q.2. Translate the next nine lines of the record, given here.

|         |         |                 |     |
|---------|---------|-----------------|-----|
| T K     |         | F R P B L G T S |     |
| S       | H R A O | U               | T   |
|         | H R A O | E               |     |
|         | W       | O               | P B |
|         | H       | U               | P B |
|         | P       | E               | R S |
| T P H   | O       |                 | T   |
| T K P W |         |                 | L T |
| T       | A O     | E               |     |

Also, this unusual entry machine seems to be related to Scambridge's encryption.
